STROLLING: Quinn with Eve in 2009

be safe to return this Christmas. He had successfully fought off a similar order last year because he wasn't in the country when it was made by the High Court.

Countless people who have attended his mind bending seminars in the sun over the past few years have also received letters from the Revenue saying they are examining payments they made to Quinn's off-shore company in Jersey.

At the same time lawyers representing Cornec had told the Irish courts that they wanted to quiz Derek Lawlor, Quinn's childhood friend from Malahide, and an associate of his in his business in recent years.

The company, INE, pumps up to 5,500 barrels of high grade oil every day, making an estimated profit of $100 million a year. It is worth almost one billion dollars; and has 12 million barrels of reserves, enough to keep it going for over five years. It is owned by 350 Irish shareholders none of whom have received a penny in dividends.

Another shareholder, Maire Lalor, is attempting to take a class action against Quinn and Morrice in the US and her lawyers are likely to serve him a summons this weekend in relation to the proceedings.

Meanwhile Quinn is still trying to blag money out of his hard pressed Irish followers. Today he is due in the RDS for his annual meeting with his 'Educo' cult devotees at the RDS.

Quinn has amassed a huge fortune by conning followers out of millions of their personal savings to fund his lavish lifestyle.
